NOTE FROM THE CEO

President and CEO Eric Crowell believes UnityPoint Health’s employees are one of the company’s top priorities. He fundamentally believes in UnityPoint Health’s statement, “Come for a job, stay for a career,” and as he says, “Our commitment to them impacts everything we do, from patient satisfaction to financial outcomes. Our focused efforts on training, coaching and educating our frontline workers have removed career barriers and have provided opportunities for growth, both personally and professionally.”

The 2015 CareerSTAT Frontline Health Care Worker Champions recognition program is generously funded by The Joyce Foundation.

FRONTLINE SUCCESS

In 2012, Wendy Fausett started working for UnityPoint Health as a frontline employee working in housekeeping. Although Wendy wanted to advance herself at UnityPoint Health, she thought that her criminal background and a lack of formal higher education would prevent her from advancement. However, by working with UnityPoint’s Retention Specialist, Wendy realized that possessing the right skills was the most important factor in advancement and that her background would not stop her from securing a promotion. Enrolled in UnityPoint’s School at Work program, Wendy started developing managerial, interview, and professional skills, which allowed her to successfully apply for and secure a promotion as a housekeeping supervisor. Wendy’s training led to both career advancement and a wage increase of more than $5.00 per hour.

Wendy Fausett, pictured on the right with two of her employees, started in the housekeeping department four years ago. Without formal education and having a criminal background, Wendy felt her options for advancement were out of reach. After signing up for the School at Work program, Wendy received valuable coaching and training on resume writing, updating her application and interview skills. Today, Wendy is an environmental service supervisor.
